Phase I and pharmacokinetic study of KRN5442, a novel topoisomerase II inhibitor, administered with high-dose cytosine arabinoside in patients with relapsed or refractory acute lymphoblastic leukemia. KRN5442 (SKI-606) is a novel inhibitor of the enzyme topoisomerase II that has shown antitumor activity in preclinical models. KRN5442 was administered with high-dose cytosine arabinoside (HDCA) to patients with refractory or relapsed adult acute lymphoblastic leukemia (ALL). Thirty-two patients were treated with 2-hour intravenous infusions of KRN5442, HDCA, and granulocyte colony-stimulating factor (G-CSF). KRN5442 was administered as an i.v. loading dose at the end of the HDCA infusion, followed by a continuous 24-hour infusion (q24h) of KRN5442 at doses of 0.01 to 0.06 mg/kg/min for 14 days and a cumulative dose of 0.3 to 1.3 mg/kg. KRN5442 was generally well tolerated at doses greater than 0.02 mg/kg/min with myelosuppression that started after the HDCA infusion and was most severe at the 24-hour dose level of 0.1 mg/kg/min. The maximum tolerated KRN5442 dose was 0.06 mg/kg/min. KRN5442 and HDCA were generally well tolerated at both suboptimal dose levels (KRN5442, 0.01 to 0.02 mg/kg/min; HDCA, 300 mg/m2). KRN5442 at dose levels of 0.03 and 0.04 mg/kg/min had minor activity (1 complete response [CR] and 2 partial responses [PRs]) in 18 of 33 evaluable patients. The most frequent toxicities at the 0.06 mg/kg/min KRN5442 dose level were thrombocytopenia, anemia, and neutropenia. One patient required a dose reduction because of hyperglycemia, and 2 patients required a dose reduction because of febrile neutropenia. KRN5442 was rapidly and extensively metabolized with total KRN5442 clearance ranging from 9.9 to 13.3 mL/min/m2. The median AUC of KRN5

I was also able to launch this within the same window (and in my case, I had 2 windows open): I first found it in the following link: AWS Documentation for How to access user data is unclear if the duration of the pericardial effusion, which was less than a week in all cases, had any impact on the resolution of systemic anaemia. Sudden improvement was generally followed by maintenance of low haemoglobin levels. However, one patient showed elevated haemoglobin values after pericardiocentesis, with a high ferritin value and elevation of lactate dehydrogenase. The finding of markedly elevated ferritin and lactate dehydrogenase levels and increased fibrinogen levels in the ascitic fluid suggests that there was an inflammatory process in the majority of the cases, with elevated values of the acute-phase reactants in the pericardial fluid of affected patients. However, a previous report [@b24] could not demonstrate a relationship between the levels of ferritin and lactate dehydrogenase, and ascitic fluid leucocyte count. The main cause of the haemorrhagic process in this study was cirrhosis with portal hypertension in all cases, although a cause of bleeding could not be identified in three of the patients. Various investigations were done, with extensive workup of available laboratory tests, including endoscopies
